what becomes of the men deported, we think it necessary to remove a false impression which the hon, gentleman's remarks may have created. Speaking of the criminals deported or released from gaol on conditional-pardon, he says :-- "There seems to be an impression that they go away. When there is a system of emigration going on, as there was a short time ago to Cooktown, a good many of them do go away." The inference to be drawn from these words is, we are sure, quite inconsistent with the actual facts. That now and then a man released from gaol may, after he has obtained some money, have found his way down to the Colonies is quite possible, but the idea that ex-convicts formed any appreciable part of the stream of emigration which a short time back flowed to Cooktown is almost too ridiculous to be seriously considered. Large as we consider our criminal population, the proportion released and at. Hence, Batang, by a route East of Cooper's, deported is trivial indeed when taken in comparison with the thousands who left should be tried for. Santa Foo, which some are here at that time for Queensland. But that they could not have gone will be obvious for the following reasons. Each emigrant passes the Harbour Master's and doctor's examination, and a branded man would be detected at once and refused his passage. Any one who has noticed the emigrants with their kits for the passage must have seen, that they were respectable villagers. The movements of these emigrants immediately preceding the steamer's departure are perfectly well known, and, as a matter of fact, they are respectable villagers who have arrived, chiefly from the northern part of Kwangtung, a day or two before the steamer leaves. Sometimes, indeed, a whole clan, consisting of several scores of persons, emigrate in a body-The majority of the emigrants possess some means and give evidence of respectability. . Is it likely the class that Mr. HAYLLAR mentions would be provided with kits or be able to find their passage money or obtain credit | the Wing Lok-street affair as though it, and for it? The other passengers also would strongly object to their presence, as the former | broke the camel's back; it is true, but publick would be the victims of the thieving proclivities of the latter on the voyage. The present Governor of Queensland would not time before. Another outrage which was attempted on the German traders at the Duke of York Island failed. The Germans retaliated by killing three natives. A trader from Sydney, named Frank Carson, is missing. He is believed to have been murdered. Two deaths of European settlers bave occurred from fever and arms.

The account of the massacres at the New He prides is confirmed by the Rev. Mr. Brown, who tates that the missionaries and traders felt con pelled to adopt retaliatory measures after the massacre of the five missionaries, as, threats had been made that the mission teachers and their wives were to be massacred.

MEHEMET ALI'S OPINIONS.

An intimate acquaintance of the late Mehemi Ali Pasha has contributed to a Berlin journal number of characteristic aneodotes of the brave and genial soldier. He told his friends that he had three reasons for pressing so eagerly to be accredited as a plenipotentiary to the Berlin Congress:—lst, ambition to take an eminen part in the province of politics as well as in the of strategy, and thus commend himself to hi Fovernment: 2nd, a passionate longing to be again in his native land, which he always called hi home," and for which he said he had "the love f a child," and 3rd, admiration for the person of Prince Bismarck, whom he eagerly desired to know personally. Upon returning to his friend, a meeting of the Congress. Mehemet Ali summary oriticism of its ominent members Prince Bismarck," he observed, "surpassed them all in his astonishing, length of head Kopflange). Bulow was a deeply prudent man, who surprised me by his sympathy. am not in a fair position to describe the impression made upon me by Lord Beaconsfield, since the English language is a weak point with me I could perceive that the English Premier had his organ (of speech) most completely under command: he passed from the deepest tores like the roaring of the sea, to the softest flute-like tones, and produced a great effect." M. Waddington seemed to him to be the man of greatest capasubject of religion, his friend could never induce ! dehemet Ali to speak. Perhaps the best-anecdote is one which dates from the time just after the peace of San Stefano. The Grand Duke Nicholas observed with very discontented eyes the Turkish intrenohments, which rose up in ver-increasing dimensions before the Russian front. One day he appeared within the Turkish rayon, surrounded by his suite, and prohibited Mehemet Ali from all further work. "Immediately," said he, "I gave the alarm, and vigorously stopped the men from working on the fortifications. Naturally, however, during the night we worked so much the harder. When Seneral Todleben came in place of the Imperial Prince: I thought truth was the best policy. So: I called upon him, and said openly. Your excellency. UNKNOWN AFRICA

Daveyrier, the nutbor points out how much yet enains to be done before our knowledge of Africa is anything like complete. He shows that scarcely a century ago the map of Africa was filled with the most fantastic errors. The Nile asued from the mountains of the Moon, the Sahara was only a sea of sand, and the Miger and Senegal formed a single river. The second alf of the 19th century marks a new era in geography, and most particularly in the geography of Africa, in which there now remain only seven regions, vast, it is true, on which the zeal of explorers must be expressed. These r gions are, in the north, the Sahara and the Liyan Desert: in the west, the country between the Jeliba and the coast of Guines : in the centre the upper course and the sources of the Binué and the Shari; in the east the interior of the Cape Guardafui and the chain of lofty mountains.

in the Equatorial zone; at the centre the completion of the basins of the Nile, the Congo, and the Ogove; and, finally, in the south the basin of the Cunene. The Sahara, with the Libyan Desert, forms altogether a great natural region traced on our mans rather after the information of the natives than according to the discoveries European voyagers. This region is not only nearest to us, but it is also much the most extensive, measuring 5,750,000 square kilometress superficies equal to all Europe, except the half of Russia. The Sahara, in spite of its desolated aspect, is far from deserving our disdain: its populations have a history as old as that of Egypt. and its cases are jewels which do the greatest hon our to their creators and maintainers. Quitting he Desert and penetrating the basin of the Jolian; we find a surface of 1,200,000 square kilometres. of unknown country separating the Joliha from the coast of Guinea. The exploration of this region would bring us very desirable information on the upper course of the Volta and the affluents of the Joliba, which are all unknown. France has many advantageous points on the coast here from which exploring parties might be sent out, and she therefore ought to set herself to fill up the lacuns. In the Equatorial zone some of the greatest problems of African geography remain to be decided. First, we find an unknown area of 800,000 square kilomètres in which to seek the completion of our knowledge of the basins of the Niger and the Shari, and for this it would be necessary to discover the sources of the Binue, which probably issues from a mountain mass situated about 3 deg. or 4 deg. N. lat., and 15 deg or 16 deg. E. long. The question of the Shari, which feeds lake Chad, is equally important. Possibly the Melle of Schweinfurth may be its upper course, though Stapley's recent discoveries throw some doubt on this theory. It seems matter for surprise that we still remain so ignorant of the most eastern part of Africa, the region which forms a triangle culminating in Cape Guardafui, and whose interior is totally unexplored, at though two of its sides are bathed by the waters of the ocean. Unfortunately, its exploration presents great difficulties; the fanatic and superstitious Somalis have hitherto opposed all European inrusion. This circumstance is all the more unfortunate that that country presents subjects of investigation, no only geographical, but also historical of the highest interest. The Somali, in fact, have had a history, and possess monuments which point to a very ancient civilization. Returning towards the Equator along the course of the Juba and the Osi, we might examine the supposed existence of a chain of high mountains lying in the direction of the meridians then the lacunse of our knowledge of the basins of the Nile and the Congo, and, finally, the ques-
